How Business Credit Cards Work

Think you know how a business credit card works? Well think again, because the answer isn't intuitive!

Part One: The requirements for approval

First and foremost, the question I hear most often asked is "What are the credit requirements?" Most people don't realize that in order to qualify for a business card using only their business credit, their company will almost always need to have seven-figures in annual revenue, along with an established credit history.

For example, just to qualify for a Staples business card without a personal guarantee, the application says you must meet one of the following requirements:

- Corporation with more than $5 million annual sales and in business for at least 3 years,
- Government entity,
- School, or
- Non-Profit organization.

In other words, if you are a for-profit corporation/LLC, you will need to have some hefty sales in order to be approved solely under the company's credit. Major credit cards from Chase, Citi, American Express, Bank of America and other major issuers also have similar requirements.

Most people don't realize business credit cards work this way. But unfortunately that's how it goes if you want to apply without using your Social Security.

Part Two: How they can (and cannot) build credit

You may also be surprised to learn that not all business cards will help build credit – neither for you or your company.

If you applied using a personal guarantee, then there's a chance you have an account that doesn't report to the business credit agencies. For example, with American Express small business cards they do not report whatsoever. So if you were planning on to apply for say, the AmEx Business Gold Card to build credit, it won't be able to do that for you.

However there are many issuers who report to the business credit agencies. Examples include all of the Capital One Spark cards, the Chase Ink Cash and Bold cards, and those from Citi and Bank of America. Even if you apply for those with a personal guarantee, they normally can be used to help build credit for your LLC or corporation, given that include your company's tax ID on the application.

If you meet the requirements to apply without a personal guarantee, then rest assured all of them will help build your business' credit (even American Express). But of course the predicament is fulfilling the qualifications so you can apply that way... obviously it's not easy for new companies to do!

For that reason, you should check out small business financing in the form of loans to help build your company's credit.

Part Three: How their laws and rules are different

All of us are familiar with the credit card reform laws which have gone into effect over the past couple years. However something many people don't realize is that those new rules only apply to consumer debt.

Therefore if you have a business card account, there's nothing legally stopping the issuer from those old tricks of interest rate hikes, unreasonably short grace periods, and the like. So if you plan on using the card for financing a large purchase and paying it off over time, be aware of that.

For this reason, using a card for long-term debt may not be the wisest decision. Instead, if you find a lender and borrow through a fixed-rate loan, it will probably offer more predictability than a credit card ever will.

Last but not least we have one more rule to discuss... what happens if you default on your business credit card? Well since most people apply with a personal guarantee, the rule is that the creditor can come after them personally, in the same way they could if they defaulted on a personal card. This is why, generally speaking, a business card can be risky... there's no distinction between your personal debt and business debt.

Conclusion?

The best way to summarize how a business credit card works is putting them into two categories:

How Business Credit Cards Work

Those with a personal guarantee – These essentially operate the same as a personal credit card. The approval is based on your personal credit and if you default on the account, it will also ruin your personal credit.

Those without a personal guarantee – Also known as “corporate cards” these generally cannot affect your personal credit, regardless of what happens to the account. However the annual revenue requirements to get one of these is so high, most small business owners won't ever have the opportunity.

As a small business owner himself, not only does Michael have quite a bit of personal experience with credit cards, but he also writes about them daily on his site CreditCardForum.com. On there he maintains a page featuring business credit card reviews for several of the major issuers. He personally uses the Chase Ink Cash card for his own LLC.
